The exhibition is a reminder that aging is a natural part of life, and that it can be a time of growth and discovery. The artists in the exhibition use their work to challenge stereotypes about aging, and to show that it is possible to live a full and meaningful life at any age.

One of the most striking works in the exhibition is a series of self-portraits by artist Judith Katz. In these portraits, Katz documents her own aging process, from her early twenties to her late sixties. The portraits are honest and unflinching, and they show the physical changes that come with age, but they also show the strength and resilience of the human spirit.

Another highlight of the exhibition is a series of sculptures by artist Robert Arneson. Arneson's sculptures are often humorous and grotesque, and they explore the themes of aging and mortality. In one sculpture, Arneson depicts himself as an old man with a sagging body and a wrinkled face. The sculpture is both funny and poignant, and it reminds us that we are all mortal.

Or Ain't Dead Yet is an important exhibition that challenges stereotypes about aging. The exhibition shows that aging is a natural part of life, and that it can be a time of growth and discovery. The artists in the exhibition use their work to remind us that we are all human beings, and that we should embrace the aging process with humor and grace.
