There are a number of reasons why major powers engage in proxy wars. One reason is to avoid direct conflict with another major power. By supporting a proxy force, a major power can avoid the risks and costs of a direct war. Another reason is to gain influence in a region without having to commit troops. Proxy wars can have a number of negative consequences. One consequence is that they can prolong conflicts and make them more difficult to resolve. Another consequence is that they can lead to the deaths of innocent civilians. Proxy wars can also destabilize regions and create power vacuums that can be exploited by terrorist groups and other non-state actors.

Despite the risks, proxy wars can sometimes be the least bad option for dealing with a conflict. In some cases, a proxy war may be the only way to prevent a larger conflict or to protect innocent civilians. In other cases, a proxy war may be the best way to achieve a desired policy outcome.
