Among those who were caught in the mudslide was Katherine Buckley, a young American woman who had been living in Chaparra for several years. Buckley was working as a volunteer for a local NGO when the mudslide struck, and she was miraculously able to escape with her life.

In the aftermath of the tragedy, Buckley vowed to help the people of Chaparra rebuild their lives. She founded the El Huaico Reconstruction Project, a non-profit organization that has been providing aid to the community since the mudslide.

Buckley's work has been met with gratitude by the people of Chaparra. "Katherine is an inspiration to us all," said Maria Quispe, a local resident who lost her home in the mudslide. "She has helped us to rebuild our community and to find hope in the midst of tragedy."

Buckley's story is a testament to the power of hope and resilience. It is a story of how one person can make a difference in the world, even in the face of overwhelming odds.

The Mudslide

The El Huaico mudslide was one of the deadliest natural disasters in Peru's history. The mudslide occurred in the early hours of March 31, 2017, after days of heavy rains had saturated the ground. The rains triggered a landslide on the slopes of Mount Huayna Picchu, which sent a torrent of mud, rocks, and debris crashing down into the town of Chaparra.

The mudslide destroyed hundreds of homes and businesses, and it killed more than 100 people. The mudslide also left a trail of destruction in its wake, damaging roads, bridges, and other infrastructure.

The El Huaico mudslide was a devastating blow to the community of Chaparra. The town was home to about 5,000 people, many of whom were subsistence farmers. The mudslide destroyed their homes, their livelihoods, and their sense of community.
