The Doris Cycle

The Doris Cycle was a group of women who were born in the late 1890s and early 1900s. They came from different backgrounds, but they shared a common experience of growing up in a time of great social change. They were the first generation of women to grow up with the vote, and they were determined to make their voices heard.

The Doris Cycle was named after Doris Stevens, a writer and activist who was one of the group's most prominent members. Stevens was a vocal advocate for women's rights, and she used her writing to challenge traditional gender roles. Other members of the Doris Cycle included Zelda Fitzgerald, Edna St. Vincent Millay, and Margaret Mead.

These women were all talented and ambitious, and they used their talents to make a difference in the world. They were writers, artists, activists, and socialites. They were the first generation of women to live on their own terms, and they helped to change the way that society viewed women.

The Jazz Age

The Jazz Age was a time of great social and cultural change in the United States. It was a time of economic prosperity, flappers, and new freedoms for women. The Jazz Age was named after the jazz music that was popular at the time. Jazz was a new and exciting type of music, and it quickly became a symbol of the era.

The Jazz Age was a time of great social change. The old order was breaking down, and a new order was emerging. Women were gaining new freedoms, and they were beginning to assert their independence. The Jazz Age was also a time of great cultural change. New forms of art and literature were emerging, and people were beginning to experiment with new ways of living.
