While Maycomb is a fictional town, it is based on Monroeville, where Lee grew up. Many of the characters and events in the novel are based on real people and events from Lee's childhood. For example, Scout's father, Atticus Finch, is based on Lee's own father, Amasa Coleman Lee, who was a lawyer and state legislator. The novel's antagonist, Bob Ewell, is based on a real-life resident of Monroeville who was accused of raping a young girl.

The town of Monroeville has embraced its connection to "To Kill a Mockingbird." The town's historic courthouse, which is featured in the novel, has been turned into a museum dedicated to the book and its author. The museum includes exhibits on Lee's life and work, as well as artifacts from the novel's setting. Visitors can also take a guided tour of the town, which includes stops at the locations that inspired the novel's characters and events.

In addition to the courthouse museum, there are several other places in Monroeville that are associated with "To Kill a Mockingbird." The town's First United Methodist Church is where Lee attended church as a child. The church is mentioned in the novel, and it is where the funeral of Tom Robinson, the novel's tragic hero, is held.

Another popular tourist destination in Monroeville is the Old Monroe County Jail. This is the jail where Tom Robinson is held before his trial. The jail is now a museum, and visitors can take a tour of the cells and learn about the history of the jail.

For fans of "To Kill a Mockingbird," a visit to Monroeville is a must. The town is a living testament to the power of literature and the enduring legacy of Harper Lee's masterpiece.
